The distinctive local food of Nagoya and Aichi

なごやめし Nagoya Meshi

Nagoya meshi is well-loved unique regional food that enjoys broad acceptance by many in Nagoya and its environs, and is eaten in households and dining establishments. A menu item that spreads to a large number of the region's eateries and becomes broadly accepted could also someday become a new kind of Nagoya meshi. Opinions differ about what kinds of Nagoya meshi there are, but here we'll tell you about 15 items that have been voted the most popular.

This is because it's people who love Nagoya meshi who decide what it is.

Hitsumabushi
Sauce-dipped, charcoal-grilled beef is cut into strips and scattered ("mabushi") over a bed of rice in a hot "chubu", which is then enjoyed by scooping out helpings into a rice bowl at a time.

Miso-nikomi Udon Noodles
This is udon noodles stewed in a soybean-miso soup. The sight, sound, and aroma of the soup-hot soup building in an earthenware bowl stimulates the appetite. This local item takes advantage of how soybean miso stays flavorful even when brought to a boil.

Miso-katsu
This is tonkatsu – breaded and deep-fried pork cutlets – with a sauce made using soybean miso. Kani-katsu – skewered cubes of pork that are breaded and deep fried – are a variation. The wonderful flavor of this unlikely pairing is Nagoya meshi.

Tebasaki Chicken Wings
A cross-noodle name for these would be "tebasaki" unbranded fried chicken wings. "Tebasaki" means "wing" in Japanese, referring to the part of the chicken used to make them. Tebasaki wings are prepared by deep-frying without breading, coating with a sweet-sour spicy sauce. Then sprinkling with sesame seeds for a small treat and a hot bowl of spicy food.

Kishimen Noodles
This is a type of udon in which the noodles are made broad and flat. The sauce has a tamarind soybean base, and generally contains both taken from ligate tuna or horse mackerel.

Ankake Spaghetti
This is characterized by a thick sauce called "ank" used in Japanese and Chinese dishes that have a spicy bite from black pepper. The noodles are mainly a thick 2.2 mm in diameter.

Ten-musu
This is a small musubi rice ball containing a piece of shrimp tempura and wrapped in nori seaweed. The flavor of the shrimp tempura and the light softness of the rice make for a tasty snack.

Dote-ni
This features pork or beef organ meats stewed in a soybean-miso soup. Elsewhere throughout Japan this dish is made using a soy sauce-based soup and called "motsu-ni", but the version in the Tokai region is distinct in using soybean miso and having a rich, spicy-sweet flavor.

Teppan Spaghetti
Spaghetti flavored with a ketchup-based sauce is cooked on a hot iron teppan grill with lightly scrambled egg poured around it. This is eaten not at specialty restaurants, but mainly at traditional kassanten coffee shops.

Taiwan Ramen
This form of ramen noodles that originated in Nagoya features Taiwan (dashi) noodles in an extremely spicy preparation. Topped with a pungent minced miso that contains dried chili peppers and garlic. It also usually contains rice (garlic chives) and bean sprouts.

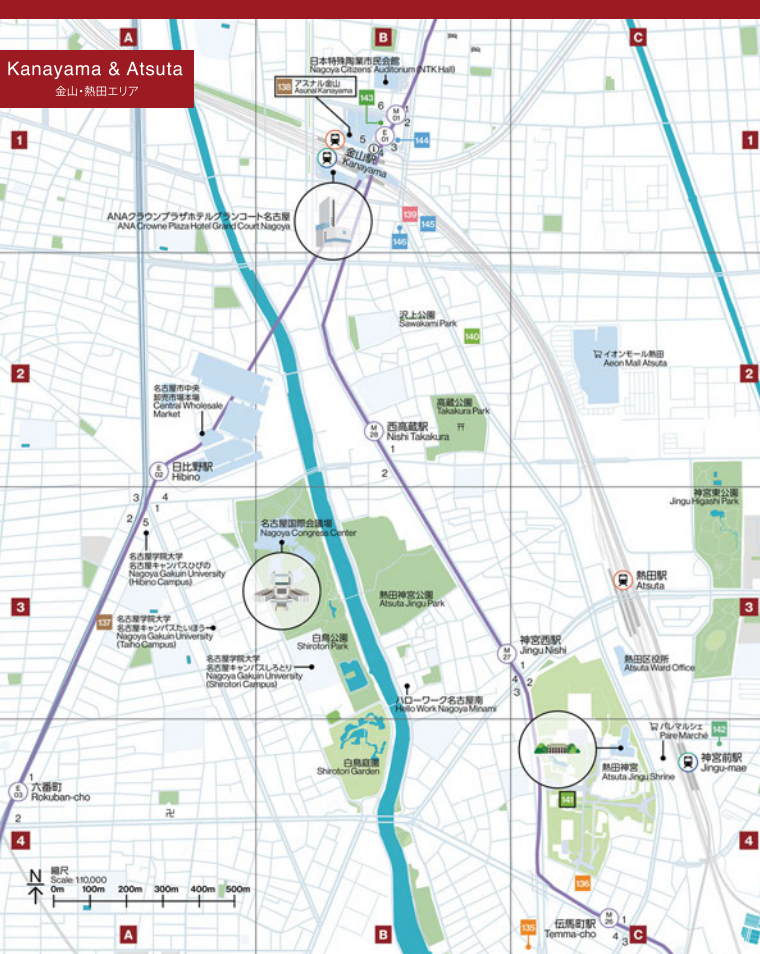

Miso Oden
This is broadly divided into two types: one in which the ingredients are stewed in a soybean-miso broth, and one in which the ingredients are stewed in a soy sauce-based broth. That's right, Kanto-style oden – with the miso applied at the time of consumption. In general, oden and other such eatables serve the first kind, with the second kind enjoyed at home.

Ogura Toast
This sweet treat enjoyed in traditional kassanten coffee shops is a blend of Western and Japanese styles that combines red bean paste called anko with toast. The toast is first spread with butter or margarine, and the softness of the toast further combined with the warmth of the toast further enhance the mellow sweetness of the anko.

Ebi-furai
Ebi-furai – deep-fried breaded prawns – are a kind of Western-style food that originated in Japan. The kind of origin came to Nagoya, and the kind of food is not limited to this region, but the Japanese food prawn is the prefectural marine organism of Aichi, and prawn consumption in the prefecture is so high, so it's clear that the people of Aichi love prawns.

Curry Udon Noodles
Curry udon originated in Tokyo in the late-meiji/early Meiji period and spread throughout the country, but what became popular in Nagoya and the surrounding area was "Nagoya-style curry udon," a unique variation.

Nagoya Cochin Chicken
This area boasts the Nagoya Cochin, which enjoys tremendous brand appeal as the region's original local breed of poultry. The form of the meat and the color of the wing are thought to resemble the oak, and so "Oakmeat" (kashi) has come to be synonymous with the flesh of this bird.

What makes soybean miso (red miso) so amazing!

1 It's made using only soybeans and salt. This makes it a purer flavor than miso that uses rice koji (fermentation) or barley miso that uses barley koji.

2 It matures in one to three years. This is far longer than for other types of miso, which mature in a year or less.

3 It's rich in savory umami flavor agents, especially glutamate. In terms of quantity, it's actually considered twice as much as rice or barley miso.

4 Quality is stable and keeps for long periods. It also stands up well to heat, and stays flavorful even if frozen.

About the Nagoya Meshi Promotion Council

In fiscal year 2014, Aichi Prefecture and the city of Nagoya joined together to hold the Nagoya Meshi PR Round-table Conference to establish Nagoya Meshi as a regional brand and discuss such matters as methods for promoting Nagoya Meshi in a strategic manner. Because of the pressing need to position Nagoya Meshi as a distinctive tourism resource for the region and work to publicize it, the government administrations collaborated with associated organizations to establish the Nagoya Meshi Promotion Council in fiscal year 15 to work to attract tourism to the region from abroad and elsewhere in Japan by publicizing and promoting the appeal of Nagoya Meshi.
